Swine pancreatic Islets Beta Cells are widely used in metabolic and endocrine research due to their relevance in studying insulin production and pancreatic function. These cells provide researchers with valuable models for investigating cellular responses, glucose regulation, and islet biology under laboratory conditions. Their physiological similarities make them useful for translational and preclinical studies. Access to reliable and well-characterized cell sources is essential for generating reproducible results. Kosheeka offers specialized swine-derived cellular products to support advanced research in life sciences and biotechnology.
